

What are the various job search resources?

When you're looking for a job, there are plenty of resources to help you find opportunities, research companies, and network with potential employers. Here are various job search tools you can use.

1. Work circles and networks:

Typical job boards: Sites like Indeed, Glassdoor, and LinkedIn aggregate job postings from a variety of sources and allow you to search by location, industry, and job title.

Company Websites: Going directly to the career pages of companies that interest you gives you information about job openings and company culture.

2. Employee Communications:

LinkedIn: An essential tool for job search, networking and professional development. It lets you connect with industry professionals, join groups, and apply for jobs directly.

3. Recruitment Agencies:

Workplaces: Companies like Robert Half, Adecco, Manpower can help match you with temporary, permanent, or contract assignments.

4. Communication Management:

Personal communication: Tell friends, family, and acquaintances that you are looking for work. You can get leads or referrals.

Alumni Networks: Many schools and universities offer career services and networking opportunities for alumni.

5. Social Media: Overview:

Twitter: Follow companies and industry leaders, and use hashtags to find job postings and industry news.

Facebook: Join professional groups or follow company pages that post job openings and industry updates.

7. Government and Nonprofits:

Government websites: Many states have government-run job boards and employment programs (e.g., National Government Services portal).

8. Academic Training Institutions:

Career Services: Colleges and universities often have offices that offer job search assistance, resume services, and registered employment. (eg., ITVedant)
